BANKRUPT!

Our verdict on Government and nation as election looms up

THE FACE of the worker standing in front of the Ravenscraig steel plant in Lanarkshire says it all. He is one of the latest among millions in Britain who have been told that his employers no longer have any use for him. Ravenscraig is to close down, and he and thousands of his workmates are to be thrown on the scrapheap – victims of a government policy that is driving this country to ruin.

It is not as if there were not a huge demand in Britain for steel and steel products. There is! But the Government is quite happy to see foreign producers meet that demand instead of British producers. Foreign steel is flooding into this country, as are foreign goods with steel components: motor vehicles, ships, aeroplanes, machinery, building materials and much more.

It is the same with coal. The Government has recently announced the decision to close yet more coalfields, including some which recently have broken new records in improving productivity, while foreign coal likewise gets dumped in this country, in some cases at artifically low prices because the miners producing it are being subsidised by their own governments.

And in countless other industries it is the same story.

There is only one word for this Government: bankrupt! And not only is it bankrupt itself; it is bankrupting Britain. It is time for it to go!

Half a century of disaster

MILLIONS of British voters will be going to the polling booths in this year's general election sick to the back teeth of thirteen years of appalling Tory Government. And who can blame them?

But if these voters do not vote Tory just who can they vote for? Does Labour offer anything better? The briefest glance at Labour's record in office – in 1945-51, 1964-70 and 1974-79 – will show that Socialist Governments have performed equally badly. And there is nothing in the programme now being cooked up by Kinnock & Co. to suggest it'll be any different next time.

And as for the Liberal Democrats, all they offer is a mishmash of policies which have been tried by Tory and Labour in the past and have lamentably failed.

This election, it is time for the British voter to look back a little further than the period in which the present Government has been in power – back to 1945 in fact, when Britain emerged from a war in which she was supposed to be one of the 'victors'. That was nearly half a century ago!

And what have we had during this half-century? Nothing but failure. Nothing but decline.

Once the 'workshop of the world', Britain is now well on the way to having what's left of her industries wiped out. And who are the ones who have helped to wipe out these industries? Why, none other than the supposedly 'beaten' nations of World war II: Germany and Japan!

In the years since the war the Germans and Japs have built up their economies from out of the rubble of defeat and have left Britain miles behind. Today their products have driven most of our own industries to the wall.

And that is not all. In the years since 1945 Britain has lost an empire and been reduced to a mere offshore island. In the days of our grandfathers a quarter of the world was painted red. Now all that's left of this empire are the teeming hordes of immigrants that crowd our cities.

In the days of our grandfathers this was a law-abiding country, with not too much crime and very little violence. Now look at it! We're fast on the way to becoming as bad as America.

All this has happened because British Governments have allowed it to happen.

British Governments both of Tory and labour.

Half a century of unremitting disaster for this country. And now they're asking us all to give them a chance again!

Are you one of those who've had enough? If so, maybe you're ready for the BNP.

A WORLD OF LIES COLLAPSES AND NATIONALISM EMERGES

EVERYWHERE in the white world a new mood has started to take hold. This is true both in the lands of the former Soviet Bloc and in the West.

Everywhere, people are awakening as if from a long stupor — sometimes with violent consequences, especially in the former communist states. Everywhere, the movement stirring among the masses represents a breaking away from the creeds and régimes based on the effort to fuse naturally distinct peoples into artificial international units. Everywhere, the movement is back to what is felt as the natural order — that is, the order of independent peoples living their own lives according to their own native cultures and folkways.

Everywhere, in other words, there is a movement back to nationalism.

What in fact has happened is that a whole world of corruption and tyranny is collapsing because the lies that have kept it going for so long no longer have the hold on the masses that they used to.

All this has been most obvious in Eastern Europe. First, the Soviet Union and its satellite states fell into economic ruin and bankruptcy. But this economic bankruptcy pointed to a deeper kind of bankruptcy — moral bankruptcy. Loss of faith, reaching right the way to the top, finally brought the whole phony structure crashing to the ground.

Then the nations held under for so long re-emerged, to go their own way once more.

But it isn't only the Soviet East that is undergoing a painful liberation from the rule of the lie. There are plenty of signs of the same thing beginning to happen in the 'democratic' West.

We too are suffering economic hard times the like of which have not been known since the 1930s. Here too outward symptoms point to deeper causes.

Consider the stupendous fact that the United States, the wealthiest nation the world has ever seen, has a government that is technically bankrupt, and an economy so ridden with debt, that no-one in power has any idea how to get things going again.

And because of other western nations' subservience to America, she is dragging the rest of us down with her.

The root cause of America's collapse is her wholesale commitment to the great twin lies of liberalism.

The first of these is that all mankind is one and the same, that all races are equal.

The second, equally outrageous, piece of nonsense is that some sort of centrally controlled international government can be set up to control everyone on earth.

America has poured out her substance to uphold these two lies. In the name of 'liberalism' she has allowed Third World immigrants to pour into her territory, forming a pullulating under-class in her inner cities, living to a very large extent on public hand-outs. Abroad, she has poured out funds in 'aid' to the Third World and she has built up a huge and expensive hi-tech military machine to enforce Mr. Bush's 'New World Order' on everyone else.

Now there are signs of a reaction among white Americans against all this and a turning towards nationalism.

Since everyone else in the West, following in America's wake, is on the same hiding to nothing it cannot be long before the same nationalist reaction sets in elsewhere — not least in Britain.

CLEAN WIND BLOWING THROUGH AMERICA

THIS PAPER often reports the bad side of events in the United States because what is negative in American life has a way of turning up in Britain before very long, and British people need therefore to be forewarned. Seldom, too, do we give much coverage to the four-yearly transatlantic popularity contest between rivals for the US presidency, for usually that is little more than a shadow fight between Tweedledum and Tweedledee — apart from not being Britain's business.

But it seems now that it might be time to break the habit of a lifetime. Because in the 1992 presidential contest there is one man putting himself forward as a possible candidate who is actually speaking up for the great and good things in America.

He is Patrick Buchanan, a columnist, political commentator and one-time presidential speech-writer. Buchan is the first presidential hopeful for a long time to give voice to the native gut feelings of Middle America and the productive white folk who comprise it.

Campaigning aginst President Bush in the depressed New Hampshire town of Manchester in the state's primary election for the nomination of the Republican Party's candidate to run for the presidency in November, Buchanan warned of the evils of unfettered international free trade.

Japanese imports have already wiped out vast areas of America's manufacturing capacity, just as they have our own. Buchanan also points out that, as in Britain, the established politicians are completely on the side of the system, however ruinous it is to their own country and however many of their own workers it throws on the dole. He mentioned the fact that some of Bush's main campaign supporters are lobbyists in Washington for Jap interests. "These guys should be wearing kimonos," he said.

Meanwhile, Buchanan also condemned the Bush administration's free trade deal with Mexico. This will allow the cheap-labour products of America's overwhelmingly non-white southern neighbour to flood US markets.

ALIEN FLOOD

Illegal aliens from Mexico, the Caribbean and further afield are already physically flooding the country. California and Texas right now are pleading that they can take no more.

Governor Pete Wilson of California says that the alien tide is massively adding to the state's multi-million dollar budget crisis through the huge burden of welfare. This is quite apart from the extra burden of crime the newcomers are imposing. Not least, there is the long-term threat they pose to the country's whole national identity.

Pat Buchanan and David Duke represent a tendency in US politics which it is to be hoped will catch on here

In a breath of fresh air, Buchanan has bucked the pro-alien multi-racialist lobby, putting in a strong word for America to revert to its traditional Whites-only immigration policy. He said:-

> "I think God made all people good. But if we had to take a million immigrants in, say Zulus or Englishmen, and put them in Virginia, what group would be easier to assimilate and would cause less problems for the people of Virginia? There is nothing wrong with us sitting down and arguing that we are a European country, an English-speaking country."

MINDING AMERICA'S BUSINESS

Finally, Buchanan has stood out against America's entanglements in the name of 'World Order' in far-away places around the globe at no benefit to herself. He wants the United States to cut her losses by going back to minding her own business and looking after herself.

He pointed out that it was Britain's commitment to "making the world safe for democracy" and such-like nonsense as a pretext for poking her nose into other people's affairs that led to her involvement in two world wars which destroyed her wealth and power. If she doesn't change her ways, says Buchanan, America will go the same way. He says that he only wants to be president of the US — unlike Bush, who seems to want to be president of the world.

THE OPPOSITION

There is little doubt as to what kind of people oppose Buchanan. His views on Jews and homosexuals, says a London Evening Standard columnist, "owe nothing to prevailing orthodoxies."

Buchanan denounced the international Jewish lobby for pushing the United States into the Gulf War to fight in Israel's cause. He has also got into trouble for suggesting that American Jews even then evaded military service. Of queers and AIDS he has said: "Nature is exacting an awful retribution."

It is possible that Buchanan may visit Britain. Extreme left-wing Labour MP Ken Livingstone has demanded that people like him should be kept out. Rabbi Hugo Gryn has urged a hostile reception for Buchanan if he comes.

But so far this sort of opposition has never stopped Buchanan. Nor has it stopped his fellow nationalist-minded Republican David Duke, who recently won 40 per-cent of the vote in the election for the governorship of Louisiana. Duke says: "We're part of western Christian civilisation. Our traditions and values are being torn away."

Duke got his high vote despite the opposition of the Blacks in the state, who make up a third of its electorate, the threat of big business to disinvest in Louisiana if he won, and the personal opposition of President Bush himself. None of this was enough to deter an estimated 55 per-cent of white Louisianans from voting for him.

Here at last is a transatlantic tendency that Britons might emulate.

PLAYING DIRTY: PRESS IN AMERICA PUBLICISES NAMES OF DUKE DONORS

BRITAIN and the United States resemble each other in more things than just the language.

Both countries, while claiming to be 'democracies', are in fact controlled by corrupt political syndicates which tolerate debate among the parties and politicians who serve as their own lackeys but stamp ruthlessly on real opposition, partly by means of smears and intimidation by their bought mass media.

A sign of how this practice operates in America was shown recently by press campaigns waged against people who sent donations to the David Duke campaign for the governorship of Louisiana. One way in which the US establishment keeps tabs on people with potentially 'dangerous' political sympathies is by means of a law under which all financial donations made to political candidates by cheque become a matter of public record. This means that press reporters can obtain the names and addresses of such donors and publicise them in their papers.

This is precisely what was done with Duke supporters — who sent money to the candidate from all over the US. Many of them were subjected to 'exposures' by the gutter press as a result of which, no doubt, it was intended that they would suffer professional, business or domestic embarrassment and thus think twice about sending money to any similar candidate or party in the future. "Big Brother is watching you," the message read.

One good thing came out of this: one such donor was so enraged at the attempt to 'expose' him that he sent extra donations to patriotic movements, not only in the US but in Britain!

Why should there be a 'free market'?

BRITISH INDUSTRY IS GOING TO THE WALL AS A RESULT OF IMPORTS. ISN'T IT TIME FOR A RETHINK OF POPULAR DOCTRINE?

RAVENSCRAIG steel plant is marked for shutdown while Britain imports vast quantities of steel and steel products. Efficient coalfields in South Wales and Yorkshire are closing while Britain consumes foreign coal. Shipyards are lying idle while British shipping lines buy vessels from abroad. Insanity, isn't it? But not in the eyes of the Government — or indeed the Opposition parties at Westminster.

For all these parties are wedded to one of the great religious dogmas of the age — that international trade is a self-justifying good which no-one may question.

In the name of this religious dogma, we have had imposed on us the 'free market', the unfettered passage of goods across frontiers, with nations prohibited from taking protective measures to safeguard their own industries — or at least that is the aim of current policy; the aim has not yet been achieved in its entirety, but the politicians are working towards this with all their might. This year they go a step further, with the introduction of the 'Single European Market', under which the few remaining barriers to trade between European nations are scheduled to be dismantled. For Britain that means one simple thing: even more goods from the Continent flooding our market and driving even more British industries out of business!

IDEA BEHIND THE 'FREE MARKET'

The Tory Government minister will never be lacking a glib answer to those who protest against British industries being shut down while the goods they should be making are imported. It is up to those British industries to be competitive, he will say, then people will buy their products on merit instead of foreign products; if the foreign products are better and/or lower in price, then they should be allowed to drive British industries to the wall and British workers onto the dole.

Well, for a start the Tory minister would be wrong in insisting that the superior competitiveness of foreign goods is always due to better workmanship and more efficient production; the price of goods on world markets has a lot to do with current rates of exchange between the various currencies, and there have been a great many cases of foreign products undercutting British products solely because the currency exchange rate works in their favour, not because they are produced with greater efficiency.

In addition to this, a number of foreign governments subsidise their own industries — specifically in order to enable them to lower their prices on world markets and drive their competitors out of business. Korean shipbuilders, whose products have badly hit British shipyards, are one case in point. Polish coal is another. And there are many more.

These factors apart, many foreign producers achieve lower prices simply by paying their workers much lower wages. This is particularly the case with factories in the Far East, where wage-rates on the shop floor are on average far below the British level.

NOT A GAME

But supposing we take our Tory minister at his word and accept that there are many cases where foreign products compete successfully in the British market on merit alone, being better, cheaper or both. Where does that leave us? Does that justify our letting our own industries go to ruin to make way for them? We cannot think of a single reason why it should.

In fact, the argument that we should allow British industries to be destroyed merely because the products of foreign industries are better or cheaper is about as intelligent as saying that if the tanks, guns and aircraft of an enemy in wartime are of a better standard than those of our own forces we should just lay down our arms and let that enemy walk all over us!

The international struggle for economic advantage is not a game, in which we can conduct things in accordance with the sporting credo: "May the best side win!" That struggle is much more like a war. And in a war you do not win by letting the enemy shoot your weapons to pieces — or by letting him bomb your factories to rubble. If his own armaments are better than yours, perhaps by reason of being made in factories where production is more efficiently organised and workmanship of a superior standard, you do everything possible to organise your own production better and get your own workers to perform to better standards. But what you do not do is shut your own factories down and let the enemy win the war!

COMPETITION

Here of course is where our Tory minister will bring in his next argument. To get our factories performing to the highest standards, he will say, we need competition. Where there is international free trade, there will be more competition. This, surely, is what is needed to get British industry working to maximum capacity.

That is the theory, and of course as a theory it makes a lot of sense. But in practice there's just one little problem.

It isn't working.

Ever since the Tory Government of Mrs. Thatcher took office in 1979, policy has been to throw the British market open more and more to foreign competition. "Let 'em all come!" has been the slogan. Japs, Germans, French, Italians, Spaniards, Swedes, Americans, Koreans, Chinese, Taiwanese — all of them have been welcome to come here and dump their products on our doorstep. Now even Malaysia is selling us motor cars — all to the detriment of our own industries, all with the result of a further loss of British jobs.

And has Britain benefitted by all this extra competition? Not a bit of it. Our industry was not in a very happy state when the Tories took over in 1979. Now it's in a far worse state — what's still left of it, that is!

We would agree that there sometimes can be circumstances in which the keen wind of foreign competition can be a positive factor in lifting certain industries out of stagnation and lethargy and making them perform better.

But when this is tried it should be done carefully and discriminately. If the competition in question does not lead to improvement in the performance of the home industry, but instead simply destroys that home industry, then the practice is self-defeating. It needs to be scrapped, and alternative ideas need to be employed.

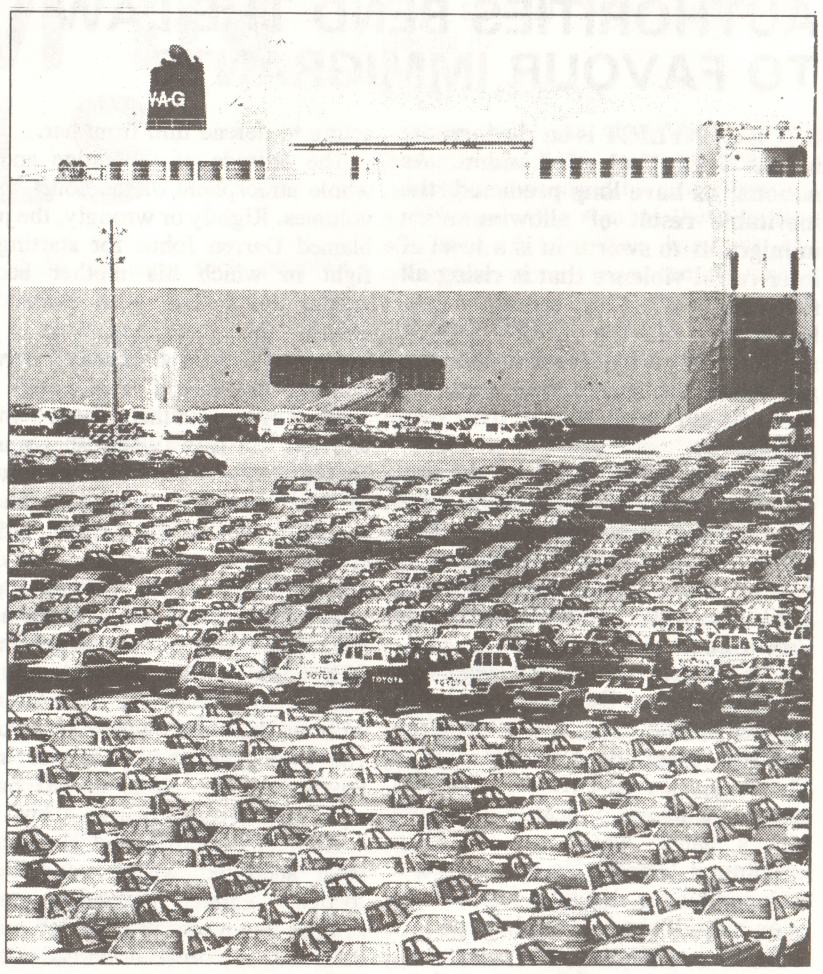
It is abundantly clear that the experiment of exposing British industry to the cold blast of foreign competition in the British market in order to lift it to greater performance has been a spectacular failure as far as our industry as a whole is concerned. Of course, it is possible to find some individual British companies that prove the exception to this rule. But overall, British industry is now poorer and weaker for the experiment. And we now have more than 2½ million people in this country — including many with high-grade skills — thrown into idleness by the import invasion. We are paying these 2½ million to do nothing. Is that good economics?

Now take the contrast of Japan. In Japan there is very little foreign competition in the way of imports of manufactured goods. The Japs have seen to it that, apart from a token number, these imports are kept out. International leaders have been arguing with the Japs for years to get them to lower their trade barriers and let more imports in, but the arguments have never got very far. Just a few smiles and a few bows, and things have gone on just as before!

And has this lack of foreign competition in the domestic market held Japanese industry back, made it less efficient? In fact it is the most efficient and dynamic in the world!

THE ALTERNATIVE

British industry could be as efficient and dynamic as Japanese industry, and we could have full employment in this country. But not as long as we remain tied to present policies.



FOREIGN CONQUEST OF BRITAIN
Jap cars on quayside at one of our ports

But there is no sign that our politicians are willing to change.

The Tories remain committed 'free marketeers' in face of all the disaster that the 'free market' has brought to this country. And Labour, though they may currently be holding their meetings with a Union Jack and a 'Made in Britain' sign to the rear of the platform, are nonetheless wedded to the international trade system. Of course, they say that they want more of the goods we consume in this country to be British-made, but they show no sign of being willing to take the measures necessary to make this happen. For a start, they are committed to keeping us in Europe. There is no way we can remain in the EC and protect our industries against imports — the rules of the Community simply do not allow it.

And as for the Liberal Democrats, they are the descendants of the old Liberal Party, which was founded on the principles of free trade. They could not change their policies without betraying their whole history as a movement. As it is, they have made it clear that they are as committed to the 'free market' as any of the others.

So this leaves only the British National Party.

The BNP is most definitely not committed to the 'free market'.

It is committed to the principle that British factories, employing British workers, should produce all the manufactured goods we need in Britain. If this means that some of the factories in question — for a time at least — are not as efficient and competitive as those in other countries, that is a price we are willing to pay for a resurgent economy and full employment. It is a vastly better alternative to having the factories lying derelict and millions of our people out of work.

Britain should trade with other countries in the goods which we cannot produce here, and in those goods alone: some of our food, some of our energy sources (although not coal), many of our minerals. But that is all. The remainder we supply ourselves.

This does not mean for one moment that we are content to see British industry, where it is inferior to others, remain inferior. Everything possible should be done to improve its performance so that it is equal to that of any other country in the world.

But you do not improve the performance of an industry by letting it go out of business. That is the economics of the insane asylum.

And it is time that we, like the Japanese, adopted the economics of good sense!

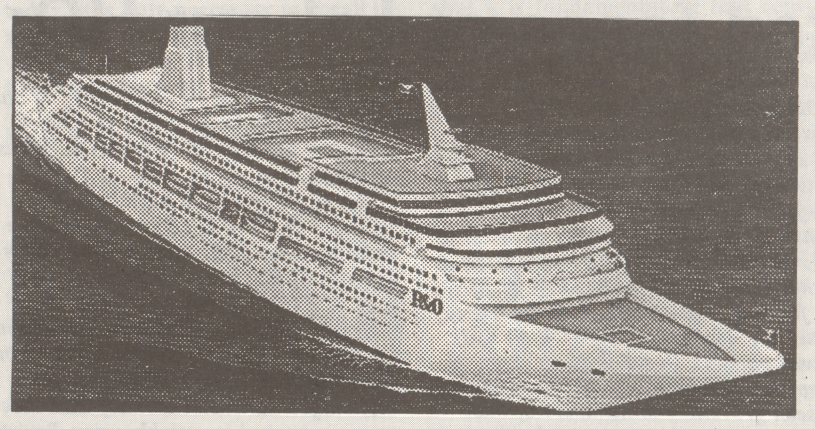
Latest: British ship order goes to Germans

The latest casuality of the 'free market' policy in Britain is the British shipbuilding industry, which lost out on a big order for an ocean-going liner commissioned by the P & O company.

The liner (prototype pictured on right) will be a 67,000-ton vessel and will be built by the German yard Meyer Werft, of Papenburg.

P & O boss Lord Sterling said: "Nothing would have given us greater pleasure than to have had the ship built here. We asked UK yards to submit tenders, but none did."

Apparently, Harland & Wolff, of Belfast, and Govan, on the Clyde, which would have been the obvious candidates for the contract to build the new ship, simply did not have the capacity to do so — nor, evidently, did any other British yard. All have been so gravely weakened by 'free market' policies, which have allowed foreign firms to seize a large portion of British shipbuilding orders, that their facilities have contracted to the point at which they are unable any longer to produce really large ships.



Is this justice?

AUTHORITIES BEND THE LAW TO FAVOUR IMMIGRANTS

RACE CONFLICT is on the increase in the East End of London. As nationalists have long predicted, the inevitable result of allowing alien immigrants to swarm in is a level of inter-racial violence that is rising all the time. What is more, if the behaviour of the authorities is anything to go by, those authorities are neither neutral in the simmering race war nor on the side of their own people.

One straw in the wind was the way in which a Bangladeshi youth who blinded a British mother in the Bethnal Green neighbourhood in the course of a racial fracas back in June 1990 was allowed to walk free from Southwark Crown Court in November.

Mrs. Christine Johns had stepped in to protect her son Darren when he was attacked in the street by Babul Miah and two other Bangladeshis, Daraz Choudrey and Anhar Hussain. She had snatched a length of scaffolding from Miah's hands which he had been wielding at Darren. He then seized it back and hit her about the face with it.

As a result she lost her left eye.

But if he was accurately reported, Judge John Rogers QC seems to have bent over backwards to let Miah off the hook following his conviction for grievous bodily harm. All his most severe words of blame were reserved for Mrs. Johns' son Darren.

Regarding the Asian thug, the judge would seem to have been at pains to make excuses. "It is quite clear," he said, "that the fight was not of your creation and you did not deliberately strike the blow — it was a horrible accident."

POACHER TURNED GAMEKEEPER

After running off following this savage assault on Mrs. Johns, Miah and his accomplices had had the gall to call the police claiming that they had been the victims of a racial attack!

They tried to get police to believe that Mrs. Johns had been kicking Choudrey and that Miah had only been acting to defend him from her.

The attitude of the judge and the whole atmosphere of the court speaks volumes. Rightly or wrongly, the judge blamed Darren Johns for starting the fight in which his mother became caught up. It had been claimed by counsel that there had been a pre-history of "racial animosity" between Darren and Miah. Accepting this, Judge Rogers said that he was "always worried" in cases where this was so. He did not, however, explain how any of this, even if true, could be any excuse whatever for Miah's hideous assault on Darren's mother, or why it was any reason for not putting an individual capable of such an attack behind bars where most normal British folk would consider he belongs. As it was, Miah walked free from the court with a slap-on-the-wrist sentence of 100 hours community service and a bind-over. The judge dished out an equal bind-over to Darren Johns.

Earlier, Choudrey and Hussain had been acquitted when Judge Rogers formally entered not-guilty verdicts against them on charges of violent disorder. The prosecution had declined to offer any evidence against them.

Nobody in Bethnal Green believes that the culprits would have got off so lightly had they been white.

Nor is this the first time that Bangladeshi thugs have been allowed to get away with it. Last year a court similarly allowed members of the Bangladeshi gang that stabbed schoolboy John Stoner in his classroom at a local school to walk free — an incident that prompted angry British folk of the neighbourhood to hit the streets in large numbers demanding respect for their rights.

MORE RACIAL INCIDENTS

Since the new Tower Hamlets College opened in September the number of racial incidents around the neighbouring Poplar Market have dramatically gone up. The increasing tension that the mass alien immigration into the borough has brought was recently the subject of BBC Television's first sight documentary. The documentary of course sought to give the impression that Whites were somehow to blame for the trouble. But realistic folk know the truth. One local resident said: "Kids will hang around if there is nothing to do. Then it's like pouring a pint of milk into a half-pint bottle." Another said: "There are many Asian students who just hang around at lunchtime. Then there is trouble. A lot of the time they cause it."

One hundred per-cent to blame for this are the people who run this country both at national and local level. They are the ones who, to begin with, have introduced the masses of immigrants into Britain.

To add insult to injury, it is the Whites who are made to pay in every way for this. Bangladeshis, who have large families, are subsidised at public expense through the tax and welfare system. Local East Enders, born and bred in the area, meanwhile have to suffer their once homogeneous British neighbourhoods being packed with the newcomers, who turn them into replicas of Dacca, with the atmosphere punctuated with the pungent reek of curry 24 hours a day.

Now it is starting to look as if the judicial system means to keep the Whites in the position of second-class citizens — denying them even basic British justice when, as is bound to happen more and more, conflict arises.

But East Enders are a proud people, not disposed to be put upon in this way. It is likely that they will act in defence of their own to put an end to this outrage. They have already stood up to be counted, not least in local elections where they have voted in significant numbers for the British National Party, the only political force that defends rights for Whites.

Come the general election, they will have the chance to vote for BNP candidates in both the borough's parliamentary constituencies. This is the best way for them to hit back at the tyrants and traitors trying to put them down.

DEFENDING LOCAL COMMUNITY
The British National Party in one of its 'Rights for Whites' marches through London's East End

Race war in Britain

IS THIS THE FUTURE WE WANT FOR OUR COUNTRY?

THIS PICTURE ABOVE shows young Asian immigrants hanging around the Drummond Street area of Camden, North London, during last year's long, hot summer. The local Regents Park Estate had just become the scene of escalating race violence.

Not least, there had been a savage wave of racially motivated attacks, mainly on young Britons walking alone or in pairs through the heavily immigrant-infiltrated neighbourhood, by gangs of Bengalis armed with weapons ranging from knives to pieces of wood spiked with nails.

Local Whites were not inclined to take lying down what they saw as the aggression of invading newcomers in their area. Retaliation was even reported to have reached as far as an arson attack on the HQ of the militant 'Bengali Workers' Action Group'.

As the battle for local supremacy grew worse the law came to be seen as irrelevant. Following one stabbing by Asian youths and retaliation by Whites, one young Briton said: "It's a tit-for-tat thing, and no-one's going to the police."

PREDICTABLE PATTERN

In miniature, this is exactly the pattern which should have been predictable to anyone except the most addle-pated, liberal-minded multi-racialist fanatic from the moment that mass alien immigration into Britain began. Different races of people do not inhabit the same patch of land in peace and harmony — even races much less different from each other than Britons and Bengalis. Nor, going on all the evidence of human nature and human history, are they ever likely to.

Enoch Powell warned of what would happen in Britain nearly a quarter of a century ago. Nationalists have done so for much longer.

Today there are vast areas of this country that are set to reproduce the same pattern of race conflict as Regents Park — perhaps on a bigger and nastier scale. Carried far enough, it is the pattern of Belfast and even Beirut.

NO SOLUTION OFFERED

The multi-racialists who deliberately tried to force the races together have no solution to the problems they have created. In fact they are now being left high and dry by the inevitable course of events. Up to now, as has been the case with lunatic left-wing race-mixing local authorities like Camden, their policy has been to try and crack down on the Whites, blaming the disintegration of their prized multi-racial experiment on the 'racism' of native British folk. But the latter are no longer so willing as formerly to stand for being insulted and victimised in this way — as shown by the triumphant eviction of a rabble of insolent 'Black Power' demonstrators from Bermondsey, South London, in a mass uprising of the area's local British community last August.

In Camden last summer all that the local Labour MP Frank Dobson, himself a thoroughgoing race-mixer, could do was come out with a feeble appeal for calm. Warning of the possibility of more trouble next summer, he urged that everyone involved get together for a long-term effort towards 'harmony'. There was, he said, "no instant solution."

In fact there is one very simple solution — the only solution. That is to end the disastrous experiment of multi-racialism once and for all while there is still time. No decent person wants Britain, once the envy of the world for its internal peace and good order, to become a racial battleground. But, as cases like Regents Park tend to show, this is what our country will become unless immigration is stopped and repatriation is begun.

Red faces at Labour HQ: Hattersley gaffe upsets Indians!

SUCH is the squalid level to which Britain's politics have descended today, and such is the miserable calibre of our politicians, that there seems no limit to how far the latter are prepared to degrade themselves in the rush for votes.

To no-one does this rule apply more starkly than Labour Deputy Leader and MP for Birmingham (Sparkbrook) Roy Hattersley. Hattersley's constituency is heavily populated by Pakistanis, most of whom are Moslems, and he is regularly to be seen grovelling to members of this community in order to ensure holding onto their support at election time. With a general election due very shortly, he has been especially busy of late seeking to ingratiate himself with this section of his constituents.

But Roy appears to have been so zealous in the pursuit that he has come unstuck. Over in Asia there is currently raging a dispute over the status of Kashmir, a mainly Moslem enclave in Northern India most of whose inhabitants want to break free of Indian domination and form an Islamic state of their own. In this bid for independence they have been strongly backed by neighbouring Pakistan, also an Islamic nation.

By any normal and sane criteria, this dispute is none of Britain's business. However, Mr. Hattersley, hearing that a lot of his Pakistani constituents backed the Kashmir claim to independence, hastened to declare himself in support of it.

MISCALCULATION

This, however, turned out to be a big mistake. Labour HQ learned that by such a move the party could alienate large numbers of the 850,000 Indian voters in Britain and thereby risk losing up to 40 seats — yes, 40! — in London, Birmingham, Coventry, Wolverhampton, Leicester and Manchester. A rapid disclaimer was issued by party leader Neil Kinnock, who assured his Indian friends that "we (the Labour Party) recognise the territorial integrity of India." Said Neil later: "Electoral gain in some constituencies can also be a disaster for the Labour Party in other constituencies." Quite.

So there we have it. Labour policy at the coming general election will not be decided in accordance with such old-fashioned considerations as the interests of Britain and her people; it will be determined by the fact that the Indian vote is seen by the party to be important in more constituencies than the Pakistani one.

Such are the priorities that reign in Britain in the 1990s!

Multi-racial education in Britain

PRO-MINORITY WEAKNESS LEADS TO BEDLAM IN NATION'S SCHOOLS

YET ANOTHER RACE ROW has broken out in a British school. This time it is the Stratford School in Bow, East London, where Asians on the Board of Governors illegally suspended a headmistress for alleged 'racism' in her attitudes.

The ringleader among the governors is a Mr. Ghalam Rasood Shaida, the 54-year-old son of a Moslem Pakistani peasant. He and his allies on the Board, including one Harbajan Singh, a Sikh who doubles as a Labour councillor for Bexley, South London, are accusing Mrs. Anne Snelling of ignoring the local Asian community and depriving her pupils of a Moslem education.

In particular, they say that since she became head of the school, when it opted a year ago for grant-maintained status under the Government's opt-out scheme, she has appointed only white staff. Ironically, however, she took on Mr. Shaida, who sports a degree from Peshawar University, as a part-time teacher. It is said that during his time in the post he built up a list of complaints against her.

Using his governor's position, Shaida has been known to patrol the school premises doing 'spot-checks' on teachers. He bawled out one for punishing his daughter, and finally moved to get Mrs. Snelling suspended after an unseemly squabble at the end of which she called the police.

UNGRATEFUL IMMIGRANT

Shaida has done well out of Britain, having exchanged a job as a bus conductor at one point to become a physics teacher at a Burnley girls' school. But according to one report he complains that 'racism' in this country has marred his career, and sees Britain as a hostile environment for himself and his kind.

SHAIDA
Led campaign against headmistress

As for Mrs. Snelling, far from being a 'racist' she is in fact an identikit middle class bleeding heart. She was attracted to the headship of Stratford School, where 90 per-cent of the pupils are from immigrant backgrounds, in the first place by a desire, as she saw it, to do good for ethnic minority youngsters, whom she saw as getting a "raw deal" from Britain's educational system.

She seems unable to understand the attitudes of Shaida & Co. She doesn't seem to grasp that if you invite aliens into your land free, gratis and for nothing, and then tell them that despite your generosity they are still some sort of poor, put-upon "underprivileged" victims entitled to special consideration at your expense, a great many of them will take you at your word. They might allow you to carry on in your work on their behalf for as long as they think you are useful – as has been the experience of Mrs. Snelling, who built up Stratford School from next to nothing following a bruising battle with left-wing Newham Council over its opt-out decision. But the time will inevitably come when such people will want to carry on without requiring your help and patronage any longer.

With Mrs. Snelling the penny does not seem yet to have dropped. She has apparently taken to frequenting Hindu temples and Moslem mosques in order to try to 'understand' the cultures of her pupils. But this sort of posturing is more likely to earn such people's contempt than their respect.

WORLDS APART

The fact is that Mrs. Snelling and Mr. Shaida are at cross purposes. She believes in 'fairness' and in a world of 'harmony'. He, on the other hand, believes in victory in a world of conflict. East is east and west is west...

There can be no meeting of minds in such a situation, and it is obvious who is living in the real world and who is inhabiting cloud-cuckooland. It is also obvious who is going to win in the long run if Mrs. Snelling's type of attitudes continue to dominate British minds. Mrs. Snelling would do much better to read up on the history of the British Raj in India, for a start.

Meanwhile, by order of Home Secretary Kenneth Baker, Mrs. Snelling has returned to her post. Shaida & Co. have not given up, however. They have threatened that unless Baker reverses his decision and kicks her out the Asian population of Bow might withdraw their children from Stratford School, effectively closing it.

CHAOS GROWS

Meanwhile, the chaos brought to Britain's schools by mass immigration is being compounded by other stresses and strains. One sign of these is the whopping £11 million hand-out of taxpayers' money from central funds just given to the East London borough of Tower Hamlets to teach immigrant pupils English. This is the highest award of its kind to any local authority in Britain.

Children in Tower Hamlets schools are said to be some of the worst readers in the country. More than half can barely speak our language.

It is quite openly stated that the vast sum doled out to the borough is for the benefit of the Bangladeshi and Afro-Caribbean youngsters whom the borough's Liberal Democrat council has allowed to swamp its schools. The Government has dispensed this money at a time when it is telling the country that there is little to spare for improving the education of native-born Britons.

With the sort of bedlam and babel that multi-racialism is bringing to British schools it is in any case impossible to work any improvements. Only when multi-racialism is brought to an end will there be any hope of a decent future for our kids.

Moslem militants move to defy Britain's laws

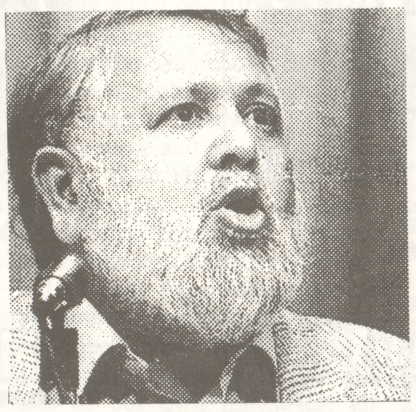
MULTI-CULTURALISM COMES UNSTUCK

THEY'VE now been trying to tell us for nigh on two generations that Britain can throw her doors open to all comers of every race, colour and creed from the four corners of the globe, and that at the end of it all we will somehow manage to settle down and live happily ever after in 'multi-racial' and 'multi-cultural' bliss.

According to our politicians, media hot-air merchants and all the other verbalisers in our society, the process is supposed to be "enriching our culture." This is the kind of drivel they've all been spouting as they've worked night and day over many years, without so much as a by-your-leave from the great mass of the British people, to flood us with wave after wave of Blacks, Browns, Yellows and other alien elements – each and every one bringing its own folkways and cultures before which our own people have been told they have to give way.

But now this whole experiment is starting to come unstuck, as we nationalists have always predicted it would.

Last month Moslem militants gave some sign of the direction in which, just below the surface, the whole thing is moving when they called together their so-called 'parliament' under the chairmanship of religious fanatic Kalim Siddiqui. As the centrepiece of their deliberations, Siddiqui and his fellow Islamic fundamentalists made an outright call to their co-religionists to break any of Britain's laws they do not like.



SIDDIQUI
Encouraged in his arrogance by the weakness of Britain's authorities

CLAIM OF 'HATRED'

A while back, Siddiqui, a Pakistani immigrant who has done very well out of Britain, showed what he thought of his British host population when he spoke of a "lava of hatred against Moslems and Islam oozing from every nook and cranny of this great country of ours" (by which he seems to have meant the United Kingdom).

Showing that nothing in his attitude has changed since he made that statement, he proclaimed at last month's 'Moslem Parliament': "Let us make it quite clear that Moslems in Britain will oppose, and if necessary defy, any public policy or legislation that we regard as inimical to our interests."

Perhaps hinting at what may be expected from him and his kind, Siddiqui went on to claim that Moslems were justified in flouting the law because poll-tax protesters had "seen off" the community charge legislation. For good measure, he threw in the further example of stores which had now started bucking Britain's laws and religious traditions by trading on Sundays.

Of course, the multi-racialists have tried to make light of the 'Moslem Parliament' and the militant Islamic fundamentalists behind it. Siddiqui, they say, enjoys little support among his fellow Moslems in this country. They would have Britons believe that the latter will be content to settle down permanently as good little citizens within the cosy multi-ethnic and multi-cultural patchwork of their diseased and sickly imagination.

But the facts of the real world say otherwise. For a start, no self-respecting Moslem who is true to himself and his creed can possibly accept so humble a role. Islam itself is a world-conquering religion. Not for nothing did Europeans, including Britons, spend centuries of their history holding back the tide of Islam which sought to engulf their continent.

1992: EVERYDAY BRITISH SCENE
Moslem gets out his prayer mat in London's Shepherds Bush

And in case anyone thinks the impulse to wage holy war (jihad) is any the weaker among the Moslems of today, it is only necessary to recall the potentially murderous frenzy into which the latter have been working themselves right here on British soil for the past two years over Salman Rushdie and his writings.

WORLDWIDE FORCE

Moslems see themselves as forming a united force worldwide, to which all owe their loyalty. Any Moslem anywhere, including Britain, is sensitive to the trends among his co-religionists anywhere else on earth. The trend that is stirring everywhere is the militant fundamentalist one. However much apparent surface calm there might seem to be among Moslems in Britain and the West, there can be little doubt that it is fundamentalism that represents their true gut feeling.

Indeed, so powerful has this tendency within the Moslem world become that last month the westward-leaning rulers of Algeria – seen by devout Moslems as corrupt betrayers of their faith – had to bring tanks onto the streets of the country's cities in order to halt democratic elections which would have been absolutely certain to see them ousted by an overwhelming majority in favour of the fundamentalists.

But none of this would have had so big a role in spurring the arrogance of

JUST LIKE OLD TIMES ...

ANAL crawls back out of the sewers

JANUARY saw the relaunch of our old friends, the 'Anti-Nazi League' (or ANAL for short). The familiar, but now older, faces quickly fell into line like a latter-day Dad's Army, led by Peter Hain, once a Young Liberal but now a frustrated back-bench Labour MP desperate to find some way of getting himself back into the headlines. With him is the faithful Paul Holborowitz of the Socialist Workers' Party. And of course there is dear old Miriam Karlin (no, she's not dead yet), who has joined up after years of semi-obscurity following her attainment of national fame in The Rag Trade.

UNHOLY TRINITY

But if Miriam thought she would have a monopoly of 'handbagging' racists, she must soon have realised that a new face had appeared — none other than the diminutive queer 'pop singer' Jimmy Sommerville. But perhaps the two can perform an anti-nazi duet, a gentle blending of Miriam's screech with 'his' plaintive buggerised moan.

A welter of publicity accompanied the relaunch, and the message was simple: the British National Party must be stopped at all costs!

One supposes, however, that we should really take all this as a back-handed compliment — as a gauge of our success.

ANAL's intercourse with AFA

But just where does this leave 'Anti-Fascist Action' (AFA)? The relaunch of ANAL appears to be a massive condemnation of the activities of AFA. The latter has clearly been totally ineffective in stopping the rise of the BNP, and so a revamped ANAL has had to join the fray!

ANAL has much more potential than AFA — not least in the way that its ludicrous name lends itself to smutty jokes!

But will AFA link up with ANAL? Or will ANAL link up with AFA. Will ANAL become a SWP front organisation in the way it was in the 1970s and thus, supposedly, 'anti-Zionist'? Will the Board of Deputies of British Jews support ANAL? Or will it support AFA? The possible permutations are endless. Endlessly boring, that is, and quite irrelevant to political reality.

Recruits to the good cause

There is one thing that can be said for the Mark II ANAL. It has already enlisted to its cause a great many of the sort of people by whom it is an honour to be hated. These include: comedians Stephen Fry and Lenny Henry, presenters Jonathan Ross, Andy Kershaw and Julian Clary, actors Julie Christie and Anthony Sher as well as Miriam Karlin, singer Tom Robinson as well as Jimmy Sommerville; and from politics there are Glenys Kinnock and Scottish National Party leader Alex Salmond, as well as the inimitable Peter Hain.

With this lot against us, there surely must be something going for us!

Not only anti-us but anti-each other

It would appear that the various groups now lined up against the BNP hate each other as passionately as they hate us. In a recent issue of the occasional newspaper of a tiny red grouplet called 'Red Action' (which has links with AFA) there was a vehement attack on the Socialist Workers' Party (the main force behind ANAL), Class War, the Revolutionary Communist Party, Militant, the National Black Caucus, the Society of Black Lawyers, the Workers' Party, the Socialist Party of Great Britain, the Leninist newspaper, the Labour Committee on Ireland and indeed Lenin, Stalin and Trotsky themselves! The antipathies that exist between these various communist organisations make relations between different nationalist groups look positively cordial. Indeed the only organisation that Red Action seems to respect is the British National Party, for what it said about us was a veritable compliment!

One thing is certain, and that is that ANAL will not have much future in the 1990s. As the AIDS epidemic grows, so their organisation is likely to dwindle in numbers — if a roll call of present supporters is anything to go by!

Staff expansion

Readers will be pleased to know that the BNP Bookshop at Welling should from now on be functioning with greater efficiency. We have been pleased to welcome Mr. Alf Waite to the regular staff at the shop, and his presence there will provide help and relief to Richard Edmonds and provide a firmer guarantee of the shop being open and the telephone manned during all official opening hours. In the past, chronic shortage of personnel made it sometimes difficult to ensure this.

BI-MONTHLY ISSUE

It will be noted that this issue of our paper is a bi-monthly one. This is because members of our production staff also have key roles in preparing the British National Party for the general election, now very close, and these officers must find time for additional party duties.

BNP recruitment now breaking records

THE START of 1992 has seen a record-breaking rate of recruitment of new members to the British National Party. As we go to press with this issue of BN, available recruitment figures for January only cover the first three-quarters of the month. Nevertheless, within that period alone more new members have been signed up than in any previous whole month of the party's entire history.

Nor is this just a freak month; new members enrolled during the first three weeks of December also hit an all-time high for that part of the year. As was to be expected, recruitment tailed off a little in the final week of the month, when everyone was preoccupied with Christmas and coming New Year celebrations and when postal services anyway were not working to normal schedules. Then, once New Year's Day was past, the rush began again.

These new recruits have been coming in from every part of the United Kingdom, but it is especially gratifying to see a good number joining in the Croydon area of South London and in the Bristol/Bath area of the West Country. Both of these areas have been among the weaker ones for the BNP in the past but lately we have benefitted from a significant influx of former National Front members in both of them, and there is now promise of really strong BNP units being established in those areas in the immediate future.

GET SELLING!

If you believe in the message conveyed by* British Nationalist, *don't bury the paper away; get out selling it! In most parts of Britain there are sales teams that you can join. In this typical example BNP activists representing all generations are on sales duty in Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

MOSLEM MILTANTS MOVE TO DEFY BRITAIN'S LAWS

Siddiqui and his followers if it were not for the weakness and appeasement with which Britain's ruling authorites have met their challenge. During the Rushdie agitation, Moslems, including Siddiqui, made what sounded very like incitements to murder — not only against Rushdie himself but also against his publishers, the staff of shops up and down the country that sold his book, and even against the Prime Minister!

Yet, although such incitement is a serious crime in this country, none of these agitators has yet been prosecuted. No wonder the Moslem militants regard Britain and her laws with contempt.

HOW IT STARTED

Of course, the initial act of weakness that allowed all this to develop was the act of letting any Moslems into Britain in the first place. It appears that Siddiqui & Co., rather like Groucho Marx, have no respect for any club that would have them as members. They certainly don't seem to respect Britain.

Former Solicitor General for Scotland Nicholas Fairbairn has said of them: "It is offensive that people who come here in order to steal the grapes of our civilisation now want to take over our civilisation."

But what can we British expect if we allow ourselves to be ruled by multi-racialist weaklings who will allow such elements in and then let them agitate for the breaking of our laws?

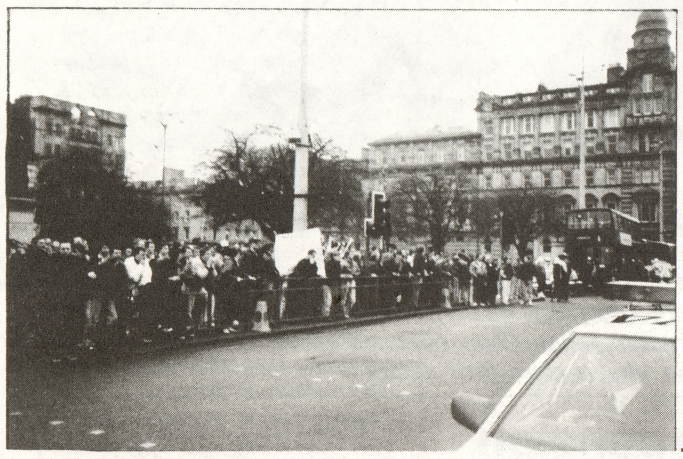
As with the French, who have started voting en masse for patriotic leader Jean-Marie Le Pen, it is time we British began giving effective political vent to our tribal gut feelings by voting nationalist. That way, maybe, there will be some hope that British people can get back control of their country so that a final end can be put to alien immigration, the repatriation of immigrants set in motion and militant lobbies like that of Siddiqui & Co. removed from our soil.

GLASGOW

BNP stops 'Bloody Sunday' mob

LAST MONTH served as a cue for anti-British hate-mobs all over the UK to take to the streets with their familiar call for Britain to pull out of Northern Ireland. The occasion was the 20th anniversary of 'Bloody Sunday', the day that took its place in the long catalogue of Irish republican mythology after the 1st Parachute Regiment, quite rightly, opened fire on an anti-British crowd in Londonderry in 1972 — a crowd which included many IRA sympathisers and some IRA operatives, and out of which had come sniper fire clearly aimed at the Paras.

This year's 'Bloody Sunday' commemorations provided a thinly veiled pretext for IRA-lovers to come out of their holes and vent their hatred against the British Army and British State, as they will find any excuse for doing. One place where they manifested their presence was Glasgow, on Saturday the 18th January. On this occasion, as in the past, British National Party activists were waiting for them.



A part of the BNP contingent in George Square. Their presence there prevented the IRA supporters holding their rally

The 'Bloody Sunday' mob had organised a march through the city centre. The march had been given the go-ahead by Glasgow's Labour Council three days before, after a storm of protest by local townsfolk at its being held.

Over 800 police were on duty — at a cost of over £80,000 to the local poll tax-payers. This police presence proved very necessary to protect the 250 marchers from a counter-demonstration numbering 200, organised by the BNP in collaboration with local Ulster Loyalist groups.

MARCHERS CHARGED

As the march started, the counter-demonstrators made a charge into its ranks. Only the police saved the marchers from serious injury.

At the end of the march route the BNP/Loyalist contingent gathered in force, flying Union Jacks and waving BNP banners. The marchers had intended to rally in George Square, but the police, seeing the big crowd of patriots in the square, blocked off the entrance to it and denied the marchers access. The republicans then tried to stage a minute's silence in memory of those who died on 'Bloody Sunday' but this was drowned by the singing of 'Rule Britannia' by the patriots. The marchers then dispersed.

The BNP sold British Nationalist and gave out masses of leaflets to the Loyalists before retiring to a pub for refreshment. The notice of the event was very short, thus restricting the numbers, but nevertheless 75 party supporters turned out, and these are to be commended.

Later in the afternoon a BNP contingent of around 35 headed towards the Socialist Workers' Party paper sales pitch on Argyle Street. The red paper-sellers were taken completely by surprise, and bolted in fright, their papers strewn on the pavement behind them, without even offering any resistance. The BNP men proceeded to occupy the pitch in their place, selling BN and giving out more leaflets. A most satisfying start to the new year!

Later, a local BNP member who was not able to attend the day's events was sitting in a Loyalist pub when the news of the march and counter-demo came over on TV. According to his account, the pub erupted with shouts and cries of "BNP!" Nearby a member's brother was walking down the street when he was spotted by a large crowd of youths. They asked: "Is it your brother who's in the BNP?" On being told it was, they let off shouts of "BNP!" and headed off singing 'Rule Britannia'.

As well as TV coverage throughout the UK, the BNP won massive press publicity in Scotland over the weekend for their part in opposing the marchers.

POLICE QUELL BLOODY SUNDAY FURY

■ ULSTER'S SECURITY crisis deepened last night as the Government reacted to the IRA slaughter of seven Protestant workmen.

■ AT LEAST 500 extra troops are expected in the province over the weekend, bringing the army's strength to 17,500.

■ DEFENCE MINISTER Tom King gave the go-ahead for another battalion to be sent after discussions between police and army chiefs who fear more atrocities.

■ PRIME MINISTER John Major has agreed to meet Unionists demanding tougher action against the Provisionals, but the introduction of internment is unlikely in the foreseeable future.

VIOLENCE flared on the streets of Glasgow yesterday as fury erupted at an Irish Republican march in the city centre.

Around 1000 police were drafted in to control the rally which was to commemorate the twentieth anniversary of the "Bloody Sunday" shootings.

There were 23 arrests as mounted police moved in to break up a counter-demonstration by around 200 loyalist supporters.

What we stand for

- The establishment of a government of national unity that will put an end to nationally divisive party warfare; the return of leadership and statesmanship to British affairs.
- An end to immigration and a start to repatriation.
- British withdrawal from the Common Market
- The disbanding of the multi-racial Commonwealth and its replacement by a new Commonwealth of self-governing white states.
- British ownership and control of British industry and resources.
- Protection of British industry by the selective exclusion of foreign manufactured goods from the British market.
- An end to the financial swindle that causes inflation and slump, and its replacement by a sane and fair financial system that will give the people the purchasing power to buy the goods they produce.
- The subordination of the power of the City to the power of government, and the harnessing of the City to the needs of British industry.
- The regeneration of British farming, with the object of achieving the maximum possible self-sufficiency in food production.
- Rejection of both the poll tax and its substitute, the new 'property tax', and a return to the old rates system, though with fairer rebates allowing for differences in income and in the numbers occupying properties.
- A healthy environment for a healthy people — the protection of our countryside and an end to the architectural disfigurement of our towns and cities.
- Tougher treatment of criminals, including the return of the death penalty.
- A return to traditional methods of education, with stronger discipline in the classroom and the sacking of 'trendy' teachers.
- An alternative defence strategy: withdrawal from NATO, closure of all foreign military and air bases in Britain, the strengthening of Britain's defences and a position of armed neutrality.
- An end to overseas aid and the allocation of the money saved to the financing of repatriation and greater help for the needy at home.
- The crushing of the IRA, the termination of the Anglo-Irish Agreement and firm support for the loyalist majority in Northern Ireland.
- Repeal of the laws permitting homosexuality and abortion (except where the latter is the result of rape or necessary on medical grounds), the wiping out of AIDS and a return to healthy moral values aimed at strengthening the family and community.
